Description:

Dated 1908, the former J.H. Beachley Wholesale Produce building is located on the west side of North Prospect Street, opposite the former Cumberland Valley Railroad freight depot. The structure is a three story, seven bay brick building with its most prominent facade facing onto North Prospect Street. All openings at the front elevation have round arched tops with bays separated by corbeled pilasters. The top of the building is embellished by a cast iron or pressed metal parapet with a central gabled crest bearing the name Beachley and the date, 1908. The rear of the building has a large covered platform along which was a rail siding. Between the rear of this building and the former freight depot was a public thoroughfare called Kennedy Street. The building maintains a high level of integrity with the only obvious exterior alteration being an added mansard type roof over a walkway along the front of the building.

Significance:

The former J.H. Beachley Wholesale Produce warehouse is significant as a highly intact and dated example of a commercial/industrial building that was constructed in proximity to a railroad. It is one of several industrial buildings that developed along the west side of North Prospect Street in the turn of the century period. This business was most closely linked with the Cumberland Valley Railroad with which Beachley's rail spur was connected.
